I have to applaud Erin Evans on her writing. While on the hunting trip, Siegfried passes by the Rhine and encounters the three Rhinemaidens, who chide him as the foolish child he is, and warn him that his life is in danger.

There are no discussion topics on this book. This is the "Immolation Scene," the longest single aria in the operatic literature. Ok ok, I meant Cecily, the uber cool vampire chic who can kick ass and eat anything she wants while not gaining an ounce of weight. Siegfried argued that the ring was too precious to be idly traded, but Voglinda told him he was foolish as doom befell anyone who wore the accursed ring, and Flosshilda argued that only the waters of their river could cancel the curse.

I would also like to see this paragon of virtues show a little appreciation for a version, staged -86, portrayed the natural innocence of the Rhinemaidens in the simplest of ways; they were naked. It was a bit different than the usual paranormal stories I read because it was quite comedic on one hand and full of every day life on the other. This was a funny story about this housewife who finds out she is on a hit list for exposing magic she didn't realize she was even using!
