Knowing where to stand is one of the most important parts of sports photography. This will ensure that the most possible light is allowed in, which in turn tells the camera that a fast shutter speed is needed for the correct exposure. This allows the camera to refocus as the athlete moves towards or away from the camera.

Your camera comes with different focus modes that you can use to get more reliable. The best thing you can do is to position yourself with the sun behind you. These kinds of images will be very familiar to any sports photographer.

You may need to consult the manual for information on how to switch your camera of the game and having a sense for what is going to happen next is more important than burst mode in every case. Youth sporting events take place in parks, at schools, or in other places where the background is less than pleasing.
