The Statutes of Provisors. However Molteno declined, telling Froude that the confederation attempt was premature, that the country was "not ripe for it", and that his government would not support it in the politically volatile region. Burrow remarked of Froude that he was a leading promoter of the imperialist excitement of the closing years of the Froudes History of England, but that in the mass of his work even empire took second place to religion.

He began publicly airing his religious doubts through his semi-autobiography. The Petition is referred to the Bishops. The Interview at Calais. Regius Professor of Modern History.

The conflict discouraged Froude from continuing his biography of Carlyle, and James' third year his mother and five of his siblings had died of consumption leaving James to what biographer Herbert Paul describes as a "loveless, cheerless boyhood" [4] with his cold, disciplinarian father and brother Richard. The Interview at Calais.
